

Save On Your Property Taxes by Eliminating These 3 Common Mistakes

by John Clark, AACI, FRICS

Did you know you may be subsidizing your competitors – and paying too much in property tax – at the same time?

It's true.

After saving my clients from paying more than $250 Million in extra property taxes over the last 20 years, and more than that, in analyzing and teaching real estate valuation methods, I have seen the same mistakes made again and again.

Unless real estate valuation and property tax administration are among your organization's core competencies, you may be making one or more of the following mistakes – which could cost you many thousands of dollars in extra taxes every year.

Here's some quick background...

To determine a property's correct taxable value, you must dig deep into the records of the tax assessment authority. Tax payers can readily get these documents, but to an untrained eye, they won't be meaningful.

Then, you must compare the assessor's numbers with your property records, to make sure the value and tax classification are reasonably correct. In the majority of cases, a company that manages their own property won't have the expertise on staff to do this correctly.

This may mean that a clerk in Accounting receives a tax bill and simply pays it without knowing there is a possibility that the amount is inequitable.

With that in mind, here are 3 of the innocent mistakes that may lead to you paying someone else's property tax – and how to avoid those errors...

Mistake # 1 — Failing to keep the assessor up-to-date with correct information about your property

---

Problems arise if the assessor's office has outdated or incorrect information on the size, use or conditions of your building(s). If this is the case, the assessor can arrive at the wrong valuation for your property – and you could overpay your taxes by a significant amount.

Example:

A communications company came to us after being incorrectly assessed for 220 acres of land that belonged to someone else. They had unknowingly been paying somebody else's property taxes for four years!

We filed appeals with the assessor's office, and in the end, we resolved the issue in our client's favour, and they received a refund cheque for $635,000. That's just one instance of how information can be mangled if the tax assessment authority does not have the correct details about your property.

The question becomes: How do you ensure that the assessment authority has correct data for your property?

Much like reading an x-ray, serious problems are not readily apparent to the untrained eye. You need an expert managing this information – someone who understands real estate valuation, and knows how to take action.

Mistake # 2 — Failing to develop a working relationship with the tax assessor

If Mistake # 1 involved what you say to the tax assessor, Mistake # 2 is about how you say it.

At the end of the day, it's a person who determines the taxable value of your property. And valuing a property is not completely scientific; it's equal parts fact and opinion, and because people are involved, opinions – like tax bills – can vary, and sometimes widely.

That means you must work effectively with that tax assessor to ensure the value they reach for your property is reasonable.

If you don't work well with the assessor, you may pay too much or you may not be able to successfully resolve the assessment.

Through the resolution process it's important to remember that tax assessors are good people trying to do a difficult job, and success will depend on having a good working relationship with the other side.

Example:

A shipping company came to us after a 5-year dispute with the assessment authority regarding a building in British Columbia, Canada. Until then, the tax assessor didn't believe, or trust, anything the company's representative had said when negotiating for a lower property valuation.

The client asked me to deal with the assessor on their behalf. The assessor and I met – for four hours. At the end of those four hours, I came out with an agreement which my client had been unable to achieve in five years of negotiations.

How was this possible? With my many years of working with assessors, I have learnt that building a relationship is key. In this case, I built rapport and a productive relationship with the assessor by understanding their position, and then by demonstrating my expertise.

During our meeting, we spent 90 minutes determining what we agreed on and got all of that out of the way. Then, we defined what we didn't agree on and worked through those issues until we reached the best resolution.

As a result, the assessment for my client was reduced by $10 Million, for a tax saving of more the $150,000 per year.

NAV CANADA offers another example of how working well with tax assessors can help your bottom line.

"We've worked with John Clark for more than 20 years. He annually reviews more than 500 property assessments and advises us on appealing about 10 – 12 of those annually," says Karen Freda, National Manager, Corporate Holdings (Real Estate/Information).

"I can think of one particular appeal John helped us with that resulted in a negotiated settlement for a reduction to the assessed value of one property of more than $20 million. John's personal approach is conducive to a negotiated settlement because he's non-confrontational and knowledgeable, and I believe that's the way to get best results with an assessor," says Freda.

When it comes to assessment, valuations and outcomes vary widely from city to city. That means you need someone on your side who understands the issues, can work with legal counsel, and someone who can say, "Yes, I know what that means," and then discuss the facts with the tax assessor.

Mistake # 3 — Failing to prepare for battle...because your property tax questions may come down to a fight

---

If you treat a tax assessor with respect, and help them do their job, you can almost always reach an equitable settlement.

But not always.

If that happens, you may decide to appeal a property's valuation. It's essential that whomever represents you before the tribunal has the necessary and extensive experience, and in those jurisdictions where legal counsel must represent you before a Board, you need a team experienced both in litigation and property valuation.

A federal government client recognizes the value in this approach.

"John Clark manages our annual PILT payments for all our properties," says my client.

"When we challenge a property tax assessment, John manages all the meetings with local assessors, any judicial proceedings, and everything required to make sure we pay the proper amount while avoiding being charged. John and the Regional Group saved us 32 times their fee fairly quickly and he has worked with us for many years."

Lack of preparation for an appeal can lead to frustration during the hearing – even emotional outbursts. Not surprisingly, this only makes things worse. Successful appeals are based on solid valuation theory and local property laws.

In my experience, it's important to have personal contacts among tax assessors in every province and major city. This way, you have access to updated and accurate information – which can make or break your case in any property tax hearing.

You Can Avoid the Most Common and Costly Mistakes If You:

- Ensure that tax assessors have accurate information about your property
- Communicate professionally with tax assessors
- Expect the best, but prepare for the worst – appeal your tax assessment, if it comes to that

Final Thoughts and What to Do Next

Over time, just one mistake in your property taxes could be costing you $100,000 ... $250,000 ... even more than $1 Million every year.

Lack of understanding of complex property tax issues is costly. Tax problems don't go away. They come back to find you ... with interest.

If you own or manage multiple properties, or unusual or limited-market properties, there is a higher likelihood for problems with your assessment, and they may not be readily apparent to the untrained eye. You need an expert on your side who understands real estate and property valuation, the assessment process and the people involved.

Regional Group will review your assessments and work with you throughout the entire process.
